British Romanticism in European Perspective: Into the Eurozone

This collection asks what British Romanticism looks like in the context of European literature, history and culture.

It seeks to counter the tendency to study national traditions in isolation, despite the cosmopolitan circulation also essential to the movement. Focusing on Britain's complex duality as archipelago of four nations and participant in a collective European identity highlights the ways the forces of separatism and unity, parochialism and internationalism, work out the constant underlying tensions that have emerged from the legacy of Romanticism.

The character, and the dating, of Romanticism alter when perceived from different national and generic perspectives. The essays here range from poetry and the novel to science writing, philosophy, visual art, opera and melodrama, placing British Romanticism in relation to other European traditions, from France and Germany to Italy and Bosnia.
