Goelman, Pivik, and Guhn address a number of critical questions on early child development. What exactly is involved in conducting "interdisciplinary research" on early child development? What are the theoretical models that guide such approaches and how is such research accomplished in actual practice? This book volume describes a five-year journey of inquiry and discovery and the research findings of medical, health, and social scientists which provides an opportunity for scholars and professionals to reflect on the implications of this research for social policy and practice.
